JOHANN GUTENBERG

Imagine a world without books, newspapers, magazines and all the other printed material we take for granted today. People had none of these things before Johann Gutenberg invented the printing press in the fifteenth century. Although there were a few books available at that time, most people did not have access to them. Each book was handwritten by monks and it took months to produce a single copy. The books they produced were so rare and precious that they were locked away in monastery libraries.

Gutenberg was born in the German town of Mainz where his father was the Master of the Mint. The young boy was fascinated by the way the goldsmiths stamped letters and figures on to coins. Eventually, he became a skilled metalworker himself.

He would spend hours poring over the books and watching the monks laboriously copying the scripts. As he watched, an idea came to him. Gutenberg's idea was to cut the letters of the alphabet on individual blocks of metal which should then be moved round to form words. He invented a printing press in which metal letters were fitted in to a frame to make up the words on a page.

In 1456, Gutenberg printed 300 copies of the famous Gutenberg bible. This was the start of book publishing and should have made Gutenberg rich and famous. But Fust was greedy, and decided to get rid of his partner. He demanded his money back. Gutenberg could not pay, so Fust seized his equipment and took over the business. Gutenberg did not earn any money from his invention and died penniless twelve years later.
